Mountain Lions go by many names including American Lion, mountain screamer, Puma, Cougar, Ghost cat, Catamount and Panther. The names are based on their geographic location which is the largest of any terrestrial mammal in the Western Hemisphere. Mountain Lions are a member of the Felidae family, as opposed to the Panthera family like Tigers and Lions.

This works because females have a long oestrus period and copulate many times during that period. Males may lose interest before the end of an oestrus period, giving patient males a chance. Also, due to the common synchrony of reproduction there is often more than one female in heat at any one time.

Lions feeding on a kill can be dangerous to people. Lions that have been fed by people or seem tame may become aggressive unexpectedly. Mating And Breeding Female lions generally reproduce when they are about 2½ years old. Courtship begins when a roaming female in heat makes frequent calls and leaves a scent that attracts males.

Estrous cycle variability differs among species, but cycles are typically more frequent in smaller animals. Even within species significant variability can be observed, thus cats may undergo an estrous cycle of 3 to 7 weeks. Domestication can affect estrous cycles due to changes in the environment.

The term maneless lion often refers to a male lion without a mane, or with a weak one. [1] [2] The main purpose of the mane is thought to protect the lion in territorial fights. [1] Although lions are known for their mane , not all males have one.
