MASONRY CONSTRUCTION TECHNIQUES 141 required for different types of masonry. Various mix proportions for both portland cement and lime mortars and for masonry cement mortars are included in Chapter 4, but for residential work, a Type N mortar is the most appropriate. The typical mix proportions for a portland cement fracture of masonry structures is extended to incorporate non-proportional loading and shell elements. These extensions enable prediction of damage and collapse mechanisms in general, but are specifically used to predict the response of a full-scale masonry structure to quasi-static cyclic loading.

models, based on friction-plasticity, damage or no-tension assumption have been proposed [27-31]. Here, the three different scale approaches described above are presented. First, a micromechanical model, considering the masonry as a heterogeneous material, made of mortar and bricks joined by means of interfaces, is illustrated.
